He came and preached peace to you who were far off and peace to those who were near, for through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father.
Hearing the Word In Desperate Times

When you spread out your hands,
I will close my eyes to you;
Though you pray the more,
I will not listen.
Your hands are full of blood!
Wash yourselves clean!
Put away your misdeeds from before my eyes;
cease doing evil; learn to do good.
Make justice your aim: redress the wronged,
hear the orphan’s plea, defend the widow.

ISAIAH 1:15-17

I love these long, languid evenings in Seattle, when the sun goes down around 8:30, framing the sharp silhouette of the Olympics with hues of red and gold. I love the cooling breeze, jostling the blinds of my office, as it moves in through the window. And I love, most of all, the families walking past on the street, looking up at the scaffolding and pausing for a minute of prayer before the beautiful home of our Parish. With its wonderful amnesiac effect, the summer sets aside all the grumpy gray-ness of the winter and tells me how lucky I am to be here, at St. Joseph, in Seattle, among my family and friends.

Yet, despite all the beauty of these days and nights, it has been harder this year to feel the joy of summer. For even as I sign the baptismal certificates of those wonderful children brought to our community by their parents, my heart moves to the more than 2,500 immigrant children, some younger than 5 years of age, who are held not in arms of love, but in federal custody, stolen and separated from their parents, many of whom have already been deported or who languish in private prisons. I think of bloody Syria, where a new round of bombings by the Assad regime, targeting the south of the country and backed by Russian military advisors, has created thousands more refugees, who move, in the summer heat, towards the border of an already struggling Jordan.

I look up the street and see my friends, the Saadawi family, unloading groceries from their car, and I recall how the Supreme Court of the United States, in one of the last rulings of its most recent session, declared legal the so-called “travel ban”—finding it just, despite public statements of the President and others that its intent was to keep out Muslim migrants and refugees. Finally, earlier this week, I turn on the television to see the President of the United States—the President who approved the policy of family separation and the travel ban, all in the name of sovereignty and the importance of national borders—failing to stand up to the first European leader since World War II to cross a national border and seize the territory of another sovereign European state. And suddenly, all the grace of this Seattle summer seems a bit less gentle and less joyous, as though we are sitting on a beautiful beach, while above us smokes an ominous and active volcano.

Surrounded by so many expressions of violence and venality, of racism and egoism, of blindness to the poor and of disordered nationalism, I turn, as I often do, to Scripture—and especially to the readings of the day. Though it is not unusual for me to start or end my day with these readings, recently I have approached them with more than my usual desire for understanding and inspiration, more than my ordinary need to find in them the theme for a homily or some idea for an essay. Instead, I seem to approach the readings these days with a sense of great urgency and deep need: with a desire to find, in the story of God’s fidelity to the people of Israel, some promise for our current age; in the story of Jesus, some teaching by which I can reenforce my hope and strengthen my perseverance. Feeling trapped in the sickness of the world, I come to Scripture in these days the way so many people came to Jesus: not with great confidence or theoretical curiosity, but with my heart open and aching, filled with need and a sense of powerlessness. Looking at the great problems of the world, I see that my own powers are too weak to provide the healing that is needed, and, I come close to despairing that none of us has that power. Though I want to believe that we can be better, I find my belief shaken by the great pockets of hypocrisy and selfishness that seem to swallow up the poor and leave the rest of us on unstable ground. Like the father in the gospel, whose son is possessed of a spirit that continually tries to kill him, I find myself worn out with care, turning to the word of God, and praying, “Lord, I believe, help my unbelief” (Mk 9:24). And just as he does for that father, Christ comes, through the power of the word, not to replace my meager faith, but to deepen it, to make it enough for me and perhaps even for others.

In the readings of the last couple of weeks, the prophecies of Hosea and Isaiah have seemed to describe not just the world of ancient Israel, but our own world; and their judgments have seemed stunningly appropriate. Hosea, writing nearly 800 years before Christ, speaks to a nation that has become rich, and yet, at the same time, increasingly concerned to maintain its wealth. Threatened by their neighbors, the Israelites of Hosea’s day ignore the law and customs of their history—after all, these are desperate times—and make treaties with the unscrupulous, but powerful people around them. Meanwhile the wealthy, unsatisfied by all they have, seek to get more for themselves by cutting corners for their own advantage and by ignoring a God they think they can buy off with sacrifices and feast days. But in the midst of this prosperity, Hosea comes to challenge the rulers and remind them that all that they have is gift, given to them by God so that they might be generous and just to others, and that they ignore such lessons at their peril. Like Isaiah, who follows Hosea less than a century later, Hosea sees ruin in the leadership’s self-serving betrayal of Israel’s identity, calling out to them: “Sow for yourselves justice, / reap the fruit of piety; break up for yourselves a new field, / for it is time to seek the LORD, / till he come and rain down justice upon you” (Hos. 10:12).

Just as it does in the history of Israel, the book of Isaiah follows the book of Hosea in the readings of the day, and seems to come even closer to our own situation. Although Isaiah is most often heard around Advent and Christmas, carrying as it does many of the prophecies of the Messiah, it begins on a far sharper note, when the nation of Israel, led by unscrupulous men, has seen its alliances betrayed externally and its sense of justice compromised internally. Far from the care of neighbor and trust in God called for in the Torah, by the age of Isaiah, it is every man for himself, and religion is just another form of public relations: “Your princes are rebels / and comrades of thieves; / Each one of them loves a bribe / and looks for gifts. / The fatherless they do not defend, / the widow’s plea does not reach them. / Now, therefore, says the Lord, / the LORD of hosts, / the Mighty One of Israel: / Ah! I will take vengeance on my foes / and fully repay my enemies!” (Is. 1:23-24). To read, or hear proclaimed, such a description and such a promise today, reminds me that the sins which surround us are nothing new, but remain the product of old fears and ancient patterns. We stand, as our ancestors in faith stood, as Jesus was to stand, still threatened by those for whom self-interest means the oppression of the poor, who believe that they can build barriers to protect themselves from the dangerous world—barriers rooted not in justice but in power; not in the faithful humility of God’s people, but in the overweening pride of weapons and war. The prophets—Elijah, Hosea, Amos, Isaiah—speak not just for one moment in history, but for the human condition. They tell the truth, and in an age of near universal deceit—whether that time is 3000 years ago, or just last Monday—such truth is an act of rebellion and resistance. Theirs is a message that challenges the conceits of our day, yet that also gives hope: hope that power cannot silence truth, hope that darkness, in the end, must give way to light.

For the Christian, however, the teachings of the Hebrew Scriptures come to their fullest expression in the teaching and example of Christ. Speaking to an age filled with imperial violence and religious hypocrisy, where the widow and the orphan remained exiled within their own community, and women and children were treated as property instead of persons, Jesus proclaims resistance through accompaniment, revolution through solidarity with the poor. In these last weeks, watching children pulled from their parents, I heard in a new way the familiar words of Jesus, “Whoever gives only a cup of cold water to one of these little ones to drink because he is a disciple—amen, I say to you, that one will surely not lose his reward” (Mt. 10:42). And watching the tens of thousands marching in the streets of London, I realized the conflict inherent in Christian resistance, and heard with new ears the gospel proclaimed last Monday: “Do you think that I have come to bring peace upon the earth? I have come to bring not peace, but the sword” (Mt. 10:34). As people of faith, we cannot be passive, nor can we despair; rather, we must turn to the Scriptures with new hearts and ready minds. For there the word of God continues to reveal that the struggle in which we engage is a sign of our communion with the prophets, our communion with Christ. In working for justice and mercy, for hope and solidarity, we take the yoke of Jesus upon us, not the yoke of slavery, but the yoke that is the joy of all our lives.

I Heard the Voice Of Jesus Say
KINGSFOLD/Bonar

1. I heard the voice of Jesus say, "Come unto me and rest; Lay down, O weary one, lay down Your head upon my breast."
2. I heard the voice of Jesus say, "Be hold, I freely give The living water; thirsty one, Stoop down, and drink, and live." I came to Jesus as I was, So weary, worn, and sad; I came to Jesus, and I drank Of that life-giving stream; My found in him a resting place, And he has made me glad.
3. I heard the voice of Jesus say, "I am this dark world's light; Look unto me, your morn shall rise, And all your day be bright." I looked to Jesus, and I found In him my star, my sun; And thirst was quenched, my soul revived, And now I live in him. in that light of life I'll walk Till trav'ling days are done.

First Reading

Woe to the shepherds who mislead and scatter the flock of my pasture, says the LORD. Therefore, thus says the LORD, the God of Israel, against the shepherds who shepherd my people: You have scattered my sheep and driven them away. You have not cared for them, but I will take care to punish your evil deeds. I myself will gather the remnant of my flock from all the lands to which I have driven them and bring them back to their meadow; there they shall increase and multiply.

Jeremiah 23:1-6

I will appoint shepherds for them who will shepherd them so that they need no longer fear and tremble; and none shall be missing, says the LORD. Behold, the days are coming, says the LORD, when I will raise up a righteous shoot to David; as king he shall reign and govern wisely, he shall do what is just and right in the land. In his days Judah shall be saved, Israel shall dwell in security. This is the name they give him: “The LORD our justice.”
Psalm 23

Responsorial Psalm
Haugen

Shepherding me, O God, beyond my wants, beyond my fears, from death into life.

God is my shepherd, so nothing shall I want. I rest in the meadows of faithfulness and love, I walk by the quiet waters of peace. Ref.

Gently you raise me and heal my weary soul, you lead me by pathways of righteousness and truth, my spirit shall sing the music of your name. Ref.

Though I should wander the valley of death, I fear no evil, for you are at my side, your rod and your staff, my comfort and my hope. Ref.

You have set me a banquet of love in the face of hatred, crowning me with love beyond my power to hold. Ref.

Surely your kindness and mercy follow me all the days of my life; I will dwell in the house of my God forevermore. Ref.

Second Reading
Ephesians 2:13-18
Brothers and sisters: In Christ Jesus you who once were far off have become near by the blood of Christ.

For he is our peace, he who made both one and broke down the dividing wall of enmity, through his flesh, abolishing the law with its commandments and legal claims, that he might create in himself one new person in place of the two, thus establishing peace, and might reconcile both with God, in one body, through the cross, putting that enmity to death by it. He came and preached peace to you who were far off and peace to those who were near, for through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father.

Gospel Acclamation
Alleluia

Alleluia, alleluia, alleluia.

Gospel
Mark 6:30-34
The apostles gathered together with Jesus and reported all they had done and taught. He said to them, “Come away by yourselves to a deserted place and rest a while.” People were coming and going in great numbers, and they had no opportunity even to eat. So they went off into the boat by themselves to a deserted place. People saw them leaving and many came to know about it. They hastened there on foot from all the towns and arrived at the place before them.

When he disembarked and saw the vast crowd, his heart was moved with pity for them, for they were like sheep without a shepherd; and he began to teach them many things.

Brothers and sisters, you represent the large and varied world of voluntary workers. You are among the most precious things the Church has, you who every day, often silently and unassumingly, give shape and visibility to mercy. You express one of the most noble desires of the human heart, making a suffering person feel loved. Your presence is the hand of Christ held out to all, and reaching all.
